When I set out to write Orange for the Sunsets about the expulsion of Asian Indians from Uganda, the purpose wasn't a lesson on diversity, empathy, and racial equality. I wrote about the expulsion of Asian Indians from Uganda, because that is what I knew. I was born in Uganda. My parents, grandparents, family and friends had lived there. I knew first-hand about the fear, horror, and ...

"Tina Athaide has tapped deep wells of friendship and family in this story set against the chaotic ferment of Uganda in 1972. Hostage to uncontrollable forces of dictatorship and political turmoil, Asha and Yesofu are heroes for our own century, eloquent voices in the face of racism and nativism." (Uma Krishnaswami, author of Step Up to the Plate, Maria Singh and other books for young readers)

Set in 1972, Orange for the Sunsets is a welcome novel on the expulsion of Indians from Uganda under the regime of President Idi Amin, a ... its main drawback is that Tina Athaide tackles a vast and complex topic but the writing lacks depth and appears to be superficial. Likewise, Athaide crafts a complex plot, but many questions are left unanswered. Only an astute and knowledgeable reader can ...
