In the epic, the god Anu attempts to curb the harsh rule of Gilgamesh, the son of the goddess Ninsun and a mortal priest of Uruk, by the creation of a strong and wild man named Enkidu (or, Eabani) (many scholars regard Enkidu as a symbol of primitive man). After a fight between the two, they become friends and have a number of adventures. In one tale, Gilgamesh is wooed by Irnina (or, Ishtar). But she is rejected by Gilgamesh and the bull sent by her father Anu to destroy him is killed by ...

The Epic of Gilgamesh is an ancient Mesopotamian epic poem dating from about 2100 BCE. It is thought to be the world's earliest great work of literature: it is certainly the oldest surviving such work. Scholars have worked out that it is derived from five Sumerian poems about Gilgamesh, king of Uruk. The poems evolved into the epic poem. Only a few tablets of it have survived but scholars ...

The Epic of Gilgamesh opens with a prologue introducing Gilgamesh as a heroic character. Gilgamesh, the man "who saw the deep," is praised: he is the bringer of wisdom, and the man who built the massive walls around his city, Uruk. He is tall, consummately handsome, and strong, a model of physical perfection. But Gilgamesh is also a harsh tyrant. He exhausts young men with contests of strength ...
